The seminary's early years were marked by financial struggles and a lack of faculty. However, the seminary gradually grew and became one of the most influential theological schools in the United States.

The seminary moved to Louisville, Kentucky in 1877. The seminary's move to Louisville was a major turning point in its history. Louisville was a major center of Baptist life, and the seminary soon became a major force in the city's religious life.

The seminary's faculty has included some of the most influential theologians in the Southern Baptist Convention. These theologians have included James P. Boyce, Benjamin M. Palmer, and E. Y. Mullins. The seminary's faculty has also included a number of prominent scholars in other fields, such as history and literature.

The seminary has also been a major center of theological scholarship. The seminary's faculty has produced a number of important works of theology, including James P. Boyce's "Abstract of Systematic Theology" and Benjamin M. Palmer's "The New Theology." The seminary's faculty has also been active in the ecumenical movement, and the seminary has hosted a number of important ecumenical conferences.

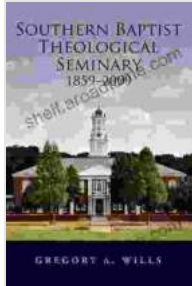

In recent years, the seminary has faced a number of challenges, including declining enrollment and financial difficulties. However, the seminary remains a major force in the Southern Baptist Convention and in the world of theological education. The seminary's history is a testament to the power of faith and the importance of theological education.
